

ABSTRACT OF THE DISCLOSURE

The preferred embodiment of a container of the present invention, as illustrated herein, is a case with a first, or main, compartment that is configured to hold both tampons and feminine pads. The case also has a second compartment, which may be used for smaller items such as, but not limited to, medications, that is accessible without opening the main compartment. The region of the case that houses each of the different shaped items is molded to accommodate the items. That is, the region that holds the tampons extends away from the rest of case and has a rounded oval shape. The overall cross sectional contour may be flared to accommodate the shape of some brands of mini-pads. The case is designed with smooth curves for functionality, so as to slide smoothly and easily into and out of a purse or briefcase, for example, as well as for the aesthetic value.